N-N-N-Notes!

Hanami, aka Flower Viewing, is a Japanese tradition where friends and/or family and/or coworkers go out and, you guessed it, look at flowers. Usually it's like a picnic, with lots of food and alcohol. Most often it refers to cherry blossom (sakura) tree's flowers, that bloom in March/April.

Public drinking isn't frowned on too much in Japan, especially at events like these.

The chapter title is a reference to Hana yori Dango, a saying that means one prefers the practical benefits of, say, food over the more ephemeral beauty of a flower or whatever. Most of you are probably at least vaguely aware of this from the popular shojo series Hana yori Dango, aka Boys over Flowers.

Dango, are, by the way, a type of Japanese sweet made from rice, typically served on a skewer.

The kebab stand dude talk in accented but otherwise pretty normal Japanese, and Micchan does the same for that scene (mostly this is shown by having their dialogue in katakana, the writing system used most commonly when writing foreign loan words, like ビール (beer)).

The only "English" spoken by either is Micchan saying "please" and "okay" Japanese style.

Mango shaved ice is probably mentioned because, while shaved ice has been popular in Japan for ages, mango has only relatively recently become so as a flavoring.
Maybe sort of like açai or green tea in the US?

Yakisoba is fried (yaki) buckwheat noodles (soba).

It's considered bad manners to eat while you walk in Japan.
